Washington, DC -- Almost half of all teenage Negro girls are infested with sexually transmitted diseases, part of a trend that infects the entirety of the Negro race, a new report issued by the US Center for Disease Control and Prevention said Tuesday.

Forty eight percent of Negro girls aged 14 - 19 were found to be infected with genital warts, herpes, chlamydia or trichomoniasis, and additional numbers were thought to be infected with syphilis, gonorrhea, or AIDS, three conditions that were not included in the survey.

The rate of infection was more than twice that of the general population, which found that as many as 20 percent of white and Mexican women aged 14 - 19 may be suffering from similar conditions, with the majority studied having either active or latent genital warts. The study urged that more youth be vaccinated against the condition.

Only half the women surveyed reported having had sex, but 40 percent of those who had had sex had a sexually transmitted disease.

The report's findings are similar to other reports that have been issued on sexually transmitted diseases, which are highly concentrated among Negroes and usually much less prevalent among whites and other races. AIDS, for instance, is a condition that almost exclusively affects Negroes and homosexuals, with little prevalence among the broader white heterosexual population.
